

If you watch reels on Facebook or Instagram, you have likely seen the messages that are marking the year of 2024 to be of great significance, perhaps worldwide. I feel it. As a Christian, I am watching the war on Israel, very closely. My church is providing aide to Israel, and personally, I am honored to be able to support that mission.

We have a presidential election coming up, between two people that I'm not sold on either way. If it comes down to it, I will vote for the lesser of two evils, but my heart is not in it. I don't feel like this year's election is an American election. If our current president even makes it onto the ballots, his family and political party should be ashamed. The man is obviously not well and has no business being in his current position. And frankly, it's embarrassing.

I've heard rumors that sometime in May, they will change the candidate. This would be wise, but if the alternative is who I think it will be, no thank you. All I can say is I'm thankful Jesus is on the throne, and this mess just needs to play itself out.

I have heard many say that this may be the year Jesus comes back. No one knows the day or the hour, except the Father (Matthew 24), but if He wants to, I'm okay with that. I still have loved ones who aren't ready, but everything is so topsy turvy. If I let my mind think about how bad it could become, I freak myself out a little bit, and I worry about protecting my grandsons. I must leave it in God's hands.

Until then, I'll lose myself in watching The Chosen over, and over again. I love God's Word, and it gives me strength, but sometimes I just want to see the Bible in color.

I would love to hear your thoughts on the year ahead.

Many blessings,

Lisa Jo
